ANNOUNCER : Cows from Scotland? Today we are talking to the White Park.

SFX: Moooo

REPORTER : So, you're from Antarctica.

WHITE PARK : No, I'm not.

REPORTER : Yes, you are.

WHITE PARK : No, I'm NOT.

REPORTER : Well, where else in the world could there be a white park?

WHITE PARK : We're not talking about a plot of land with snow and ice all over it.

REPORTER : We're not?

WHITE PARK : No. I'm a cow whose breed name happens to be White Park.

REPORTER : From Antarctica.

WHITE PARK : No, I'm not from Antarctica. As close as they can tell from my genes, I'm from Scotland.

REPORTER : You wear clothes?

WHITE PARK : Genes as in genetics, not jeans as in an article of clothing usually worn on the legs. Something, which I might add, you do not normally see on cattle.

REPORTER : Scotland, huh? So how come you don't have a Scottish accent?

WHITE PARK : Because in the late 1930's some White Park cattle were imported into Canada.

REPORTER : Then why don't you have a Canadian accent?

WHITE PARK : Because some of their offspring ended up in the Bronx Zoo, but they couldn't house wild cattle for the long term. So they were sold and moved to the King Ranch in Texas.

REPORTER : Then why don't you have a Texas accent?

WHITE PARK : Because I don't want one.

REPORTER : Oh. Well, how old are you as a breed?

WHITE PARK : White cattle with colored points are mentioned in Irish sagas dating back almost 2,000 years.

REPORTER : Are there a lot of you left?

WHITE PARK : Actually, no. Our current status is Critical and the beef industry needs us because we have high quality meat and we also increase the heterosis effects in crossbreeding systems.

REPORTER : Heterosis? What in the world is heterosis?

WHITE PARK : Heterosis is when you cross two genetically different plants or animals and get a better result such as superior vigor or size. Heterosis is also called hybrid vigor.

REPORTER : Does that explain your horns?

WHITE PARK : No, it explains why I'm now going to chase you away for being a pest.

REPORTER : I can take a hint! Really! I can take a hint!

WHITE PARK : Start running.
